Product Type	Software, Healthcare
In Production	Yes
Official Website	https://www.reacthealth.com/

as React Health, previously offered a free online platform that allowed users of its CPAP and BiPAP machines to upload device files and view detailed usage and compliance data. This service was accessible through a public website and enabled patients to independently review their therapy information without relying on a durable medical equipment (DME) provider or physician's office. The former URL to the software (<https://icodeconnect.com/>^[]) now states the users should contact the new website.

Following the company's rebranding to React Health, the online service was discontinued for the general public. Machine owners were directed instead to access their data through third-party services, often involving additional costs and administrative steps. The company now provides an official mobile application, but the app requires offers only limited information compared to the discontinued web platform.

Many patients prefer to avoid dealing directly with DME companies, as these providers often charge significantly higher prices for replacement masks, tubing, and other CPAP supplies compared to online retailers. By discontinuing the free data service, patients are effectively pushed back into interacting with DMEs or third parties, undermining their ability to independently manage their therapy.

Incidents ^[edit | edit source]

Add one-paragraph summaries of incidents below in sub-sections, which link to each incident's main article while linking to the main article and including a short summary. It is acceptable to create an incident summary before the main page for an incident has been created. To link to the page use the "Hatnote" or "Main" templates.

If the company has numerous incidents then format them in a table (see Amazon for an example).
